Navman S-Series satnavs officially revealed

New range completely redesigned from inside out by Amy-Mae Elliott published on 13 September 2007

Navman has officially launched its new S-Series, following a "dramatic redesign" of the company's satellite navigation systems.

The new devices - the S30, S50, S70 and S90i - were revealed ahead of schedule when Amazon managed another of their now near-famous slips by making the product pages live too soon.

Leaks aside, the new range has apparently been brewed up over a year of Navman listening to customers, finding out what they want and redesigning the product range from the inside out.

Boasting more 500 enhancements to the range there's product solutions for first-time entry level satnavs as well as a high-end version for big spenders.

Such improvements include completely updated maps, PIN code security, anti-glare widescreen displays, new slimline designs, safety camera info, spoken voice directions, auto dimming displays, traffic info and Bluetooth connectivity with your mobile phone.

Worthy of separate mention, for the novelty value if nothing else, the range boasts Navman's NavPix technology that allows you to navigate to pictures and snap your own NavPix destinations.

For the first time, an online image search powered by Flickr is expanding this theme and gives you access to a 23 million geo-tagged images that you can download onto your Navman device, and navigate straight there with one touch.

The devices will be available this month, except
