More ZuneHD details emerge

OLED screened PMP Blighty-bound

by Amy-Mae Elliott published on 15 April 2009

We've previously brought you news of Microsoft's rumoured "ZuneHD" PMP, but more news has now emerged about the device, including the fact that it's Blighty-bound. A Windows Mobile site has apparently received leaked details about the new device from a news tip that "trickled into" its inbox. The ZuneHD is said to offer a capacitive, multitouch OLED screen with a 16:9 aspect ratio and TV out, possibly via HDMI. In addition, the ZuneHD will also support "3D Xbox games". That HD content angle or suffix does not appear to be backed up with masses of storage though, with the new devices said to be offered in 16GB and 32GB capacities, but there will be a browser and wireless syncing. The story goes that the new Zune is due to launch around September and will finally be available outside the US with a UK and France launch - as well as "possibly" other Euro countries - planned. We will keep you posted.
